Synonyms: cerebral, rational, logical, unemotional

An idea person, he needs a good staff to whom he can delegate the routine duties.

He is an intellectually oriented person who is most comfortable in the mental realm. He enjoys theorizing and thinking, seeking to increase his storehouse of knowledge and use it productively.

His mind seems unlimited in its capacity to generate options and ideas.

The world of the abstract attracts him like a magnet. He could spend all his time working his way through a series of mental challenges without ever coming down to earth for dinner.

A high energy, dynamic person, she puts an intellectual spin on everything she does. She is upbeat and resilient, ready for action.

Her world is an abstract one where the theoretical, the speculative and the possibilities are top priority.

She may be most appreciated for her enthusiasm and intellectual insights. Interested in learning for its own sake, she seems to have a problem putting what she learns to work.

She has no patience for office politics and because she doesn't have a good understanding of the needs and feelings of other people, is at a loss when it comes to dealing with personnel problems.

Her intellectual side is overdeveloped at the expense of her emotional nature.

Simplifying everything in your life to its barest essentials, you strip away your emotions and don't allow yourself the luxury of responding in the moment. Rather, you intellectualize your feelings and think about how you want to respond before acting on your emotions.

Although you express opinions very directly and candidly, when it comes to talking about your deeper, more personal feelings and emotions, it isn't so easy for you. As a result, you have learned to talk through your feelings, rather than simply experience them.

Although you enjoy a broad variety of activities, you may often find yourself in the role of viewer, rather than a player.

Intellectually oriented, you take an objective view of life and refuse to become overly involved in the dramas that unfold around you.

Usually you decide if you like people or situations based on whether or not they 'feel right' to you. But ultimately you'll take action based on what you think is the smartest thing to do. For you, it's head over heart.

He will initially offer his intellectual contribution and then gradually withdraw from it. It is as if he states an idea once and leaves it to others to appreciate it.

He tends to skim the surface for information, so although he understands and grasps information quickly, he is not employing his full mental capabilities in order to use it productively.

Your mental activity is influenced more by data than by feelings.
