

SELFISHSynonyms: egocentric, narcissistic

While she is outgoing and likes being around other people, she isn't willing to put herself out on behalf of someone else.

Her own needs come first and she can be quite abrupt and unobliging when she doesn't feel like making the adjustment to other people's needs.

He can be very territorial about his working space--don't even think about borrowing his supplies.

Her world revolves around herself and her own needs. She gives little, if any, thought to anyone else's.

She requires constant admiration, drawing away attention from anyone else. If she doesn't hear enough flattering remarks, she is likely to begin fishing for compliments.

His complete lack of empathy for anyone else leaves him cold and uncaring when a friend has a problem.

All her feelings revolve around her own needs and she is envious of everyone else.

Don't expect this individual to share his umbrella if you are standing next to him in a downpour.

When criticized, she reacts with outrage because she cannot see herself as having any flaws.

His grandiose sense of self-importance imbues him with distorted ideas about his supposed talents and achievements.

She has a narcissistic belief that she is entitled to whatever she wants. When she sees something that looks good, it is simply assumed to be hers by right.

This is the type of person who refuses to wait his turn on the freeway on-ramp. He'll push his way to the front, then squeeze in at the head of the line.

Her belief that her problems are unique are a symptom of unbridled narcissism. She thinks that only someone equally as special could possibly understand what she is going through. Of course, no such person exists...